As any local weatherman or Magic 8 Ball will tell you, predictions are an inexact science. Try as you might, you're sure to miss a scattered shower or love-connection query or two. The beauty of interior design, of course, is that there's no real right or wrong—what's on the horizon in one designer's world may be in the rearview for another. (One man's shagreen is another man's shi lap, as it were.) Still, the start of another year begs questions of what's new and what's next? To get the answers, we turned to top local talents to share what they expect to see in 2023.

For example, interior designer Erin Sander anticipates a renewed focus on "pieces that are made by hand with a history and a person standing behind them"—not only in furniture and accessories but in our homes themselves via "skillfully executed wood details, plaster finishes, and metal work." Sander praises artisans' abilities to make environments "deliberately unique" and giving them "warmth in an understated way."
